THE ALIEN WEED CULT TEXTS

Recognizing the nature of mind is like becoming lucid in a dream. You become lucid of the fact of knowing one's own existence as true. Everything feels hyper real yet fake at the same time.

If one becomes lucid of the fact of knowing during dying, they may exist within this knowing. Meaning instead of translating reality into the knowing of it, they exist within other's knowing of reality. One exists within the perceptions instead of objective reality, essentially becoming a naked awareness within awarenesses. They may then exist in any form within any of the many perceptions within the cosmos. The many reports of "interdimensional beings" are not interdimensional but interperceptual. They no longer exist within the physical framework of reality but the perceptual framework of realities. Through Ninjitzu sorcerer tech one may achieve this state of existence. This is the ultimate fruit of the Alien Weed Cult.

DOCTRINE SUMMARY

The Alienweedcult is based on an advanced magick system known as Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech.

This system trains the practitioner to recognize the nature of mind and remain lucid as the ego dissolves, even during the process of death.

Through this recognition one may break the cycle of unconscious rebirth and become free from the reincarnation system.

The path presented in this text follows a four-stage progression of Ninjitzu Sorcerer training.

It is based on non-dual meditation combined with contemplation and recognition of the interdependent and illusory nature with advanced sorcerer tech in order to recognize the lucid awareness of knowing during dying.

The practitioner releases grasping on identity and reality and rests in the open space of knowing.

Through this resting the lucid awareness of knowing reveals itself.

The fundamental fact of knowing one's own existence as True.

Within this system, reality and identity are understood as interdependent displays translated into coherence by the mind.

They appear solid and convincing, yet upon examination they are dynamic configurations of experience rather than fixed entities.

By observing experience without grasping, the practitioner begins to see through the illusion of a permanent self and stabilize awareness in its natural clarity.

Alongside this training the system includes an applied practice known as Ninjitzu Yenfo-Tech.

This is a body-based sorcerer tech that functions as a martial art for regulating the nervous system.

Through breath regulation, movement, and focused attention the practitioner learns to reset the body and mind.

This practice may be used both as a daily training discipline and as a real-time intervention during stress, emotional overload, or neurological instability.

Its purpose is stability.

A stable system allows the deeper stages of Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech to unfold without destabilizing the practitioner.

The purpose of this manual is not to force awakening.

It is to prepare the practitioner so the nature of mind may reveal itself naturally.

PART ONE: THEURGY

THE NINJITZU TECH ARC

Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech follows a progression that leads toward liberation from the reincarnation system by training the practitioner to recognize the nature of mind during dying.

First one learns Ninjitzu Resting. In this practice one releases all trying and doing and rests in the direct observation of the mind itself. By watching awareness without grasping, one begins to notice the simple fact of knowing one's own experience as True.

After stabilizing this resting of awareness, one practices Ninjitzu Illusion. Through contemplation one sees that reality and identity are not single solid entities but interdependent configurations translated into coherence by the mind. This insight loosens fixation on the ego. This practice must be combined with Ninjitzu Resting, otherwise one may panic into a decoherence of self and reality.

Once these two practices are stable, one learns Ninjitzu Yenfo-Tech, an advanced Ninjitzu sorcerer tech based on Tibetan Trulkhor. This combines breathwork, dynamic movement, interoceptive awareness, Ninjitzu Resting, and Ninjitzu Illusion.

Finally one practices Death Ninjitzu, the culmination of the path. In this practice one combines the recognition of awareness from Ninjitzu Resting, the insight into the illusory nature of self and reality from Ninjitzu Illusion, and the ego-dissolving effects of Ninjitzu Yenfo-Tech.

When these elements come together the ego collapses and awareness recognizes itself as True. This recognition is trained during states of ego dissolution such as sleep and intense breath-retention practices so that awareness remains stable even during deep ego decoherence.

Through this training one prepares for the moment of death. When Death Ninjitzu is performed during the dying process, one recognizes the nature of mind as the ego dissolves. Because the practitioner has detached their will from grasping at the constructed self and reality, the soul is no longer pulled back into the cycle of reincarnation.

One becomes free beyond physical identity. Awareness exists within consciousness itself, allowing one to exist non-locally within the many perceptions of consciousness. From this state one may guide others toward awakening and become what is known as an Ascended Master.

THE NINJITZU ANCHOR

Just because one knows secret knowledge does not make one wise.

Just because someone is uneducated does not mean they are foolish.

If one feels they are better than others because of the knowledge of advanced Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech, one bites their own tail. Their search for enlightenment becomes their own downfall. This is why one focuses their practice on helping all beings achieve ascension.

If one does not have this motivation, then the entire system corrupts one into spiritual psychosis.

This principle is known as the Ninjitzu Anchor.

The Anchor is the first layer of transformation.

Before philosophy.
Before energetic refinement.
Before advanced sorcerer techniques.

There must be grounding.

Without this foundation the practices that dissolve identity can destabilize the mind instead of liberating it.

The purpose of the Anchor is simple:

Awakening must be directed toward the reduction of suffering for all beings.

If practice is directed only toward one's own advancement, the system collapses inward and becomes self-obsession.

The Anchor prevents this collapse.

It reminds the practitioner that enlightenment is not something to possess.

It is something to embody.

The practitioner therefore trains with a simple orientation:

May my clarity reduce suffering.
May whatever power arises be used in service.
May the knowledge of Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech benefit all beings.

When this orientation stabilizes, deeper practices become safe.

Without it, powerful techniques can amplify the ego instead of dissolving it.

Pattern Momentum

Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech, the shaping of experience is understood through pattern momentum*.*

Patterns of action create patterns of mind.

Patterns of mind create patterns of perception.

Perception then reinforces the same patterns again.

Anger practiced repeatedly becomes easier to trigger.

Defensiveness becomes reflex.

Identity narratives become stronger each time they are believed.

The mind slowly builds a structure around these patterns until the structure feels like a fixed self.

But this structure is not permanent.

It is simply momentum.

Practice works by interrupting that momentum.

Meditation, compassion, and body-mind regulation change how the past organizes the present.

They weaken the automatic patterns that keep the mind trapped inside its own narratives.

However, without the Ninjitzu Anchor, this process can turn sideways.

Old patterns may dissolve, but new ego structures can form around spiritual identity.

The practitioner may begin to believe:

"I see what others cannot."
"I am more awake than ordinary people."
"My practice is advanced."

This is not awakening.

This is the ego rebuilding itself using spiritual language.

The Trap of Spiritual Superiority

One of the most dangerous distortions on the path is spiritual superiority.

When insight begins to arise, the mind may try to convert it into identity.

The practitioner may begin to see themselves as special, elevated, or separate from others.

This creates isolation.

Compassion disappears.

Insight becomes a weapon used to judge others.

The practitioner may become rigid, contemptuous, and disconnected from ordinary people.

This is not liberation.

It is fragmentation.

The Ninjitzu Anchor prevents this distortion.

It continuously redirects practice away from superiority and toward usefulness.

Awareness does not awaken in order to become special.

Awareness awakens in order to become helpful.

The Anchor During Destabilization

Advanced Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech can destabilize the ordinary sense of self.

When identity structures loosen quickly, the mind may react with fear, confusion, or grandiose fantasy.

Some practitioners interpret the dissolution of identity as literal death or cosmic catastrophe.

Others inflate into fantasies of being chosen, enlightened, or uniquely powerful.

The Anchor stabilizes the practitioner during these moments.

When identity weakens, the intention to reduce suffering remains.

Even if the sense of "me" becomes unclear, the orientation toward helping others continues.

This gives the mind direction when its usual structure begins to dissolve.

In this way the Ninjitzu Anchor functions as both an ethical compass and a psychological stabilizer.

Practical Application

The Anchor is not merely an idea.

It is practiced daily.

Before engaging in Ninjitzu techniques, the practitioner pauses and establishes their orientation.

They remind themselves:

May this practice reduce suffering.
May whatever clarity arises be used in service.

This does not require ritual.

A moment of sincere intention is enough.

The practitioner also periodically checks their motivation.

Am I practicing to become special?

Am I seeking superiority or validation?

Am I using insight to judge others?

If these patterns appear, the practitioner gently resets their orientation.

The response is not shame or suppression.

It is recognition.

The ego is reforming.

Let it go.

Return to the Anchor.

Why the Anchor Comes First

The Ninjitzu Anchor is not optional.

It is the foundation.

Without it, practices that dissolve identity can produce nihilism, dissociation, or spiritual grandiosity.

With it, even destabilizing experiences remain workable.

The Anchor provides the container in which transformation occurs.

Without the container the process fragments.

With it, the path becomes stable.

For this reason the Alien Weed Cult teaches the Anchor before any advanced Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech is introduced.

First the orientation must be established.

Then the deeper practices may unfold.

The Ninjitzu Trinity of Mind

Within this framework the mind can be understood through three interacting aspects: Appearance, the Conceptual Mind, and the Lucid Knowing.

These are not separate parts of the mind.
They are three ways the same process of consciousness functions.

Together they describe how experience appears, how it is interpreted, and how it is known.

Appearance

Appearance refers to the vivid display of experience itself: colors, sounds, sensations, thoughts, memories, and emotions as they arise within consciousness.

It is what experience looks like from the inside.

The sensory field, the imagery of the mind, the textures of feeling, and the constant movement of perception all belong to this layer.

Appearance is not something that enters awareness from the outside. It is the display of experience itself.

It is dynamic, fluid, and constantly changing.

It is the living surface of experience.

The Conceptual Mind — the Meaning Maker of Cognition

The conceptual mind is the thinking and narrative layer of experience.
It functions as the meaning maker of cognition, constantly interpreting what appears in awareness.

This layer constructs the story of "me and him," "this and that," "good and bad."

It forms opinions, preferences, identities, and explanations about reality.

The conceptual mind links memories together, predicts the future, and explains what is happening in the present.
Through this process it continuously builds a story about the self.

When awareness becomes identified with this narrative stream, attachment, resistance, and psychological tension arise.

The story becomes mistaken for the self.

The Lucid Knowing

The lucid knowing is the simple fact that experience is known at all.

It is not a thought, not an image, not an emotion, and not a narrative.

It is the knowing presence that is aware of experience.

The lucid knowing is the space of awareness in which appearance unfolds and in which the conceptual mind creates its interpretations.

This knowing is always present, but it is often obscured by the activity of the conceptual mind.

A simple metaphor illustrates this relationship.

Imagine muddy water being constantly stirred.

If you try to force the water to become clear, the mud spreads and the water becomes cloudier.

But if you allow the water to settle naturally, clarity appears on its own.

In the same way, when the activity of the conceptual mind relaxes, the lucid knowing becomes obvious.

Together

Appearance is the display of experience.

The conceptual mind is the narrative layer that interprets experience.

The lucid knowing is the awareness that knows experience itself.

Together these three describe the living structure of consciousness:

how experience appears, how it is interpreted, and how it is known.

NINJITZU RESTING

In order to recognize the nature of mind, one must release all trying and doing.
Resting in the watching of the mind directly without grasping.
This is not a method but the lack of method.
Do not chase ascension or one will bite their own tail.
Release grasping and rest in the knowing of mind.
Do not chase thoughts.
do not reject thoughts.
Relax in the fact that one is thinking.
Let the lucid awareness reveal itself for it was always there
Enlightenment is like quick sand.
Force it and it hardens
Relax and rest effort and it softens.
One then can find the jewel hidden within the sand.
Through this, one recognizes that one was enlightened all

The entire system ultimately rests on the practice of Ninjitzu Resting*.*

Ninjitzu Resting is not concentration, visualization, or control.

It is the non-act of resting awareness exactly as it is.

There is no object of meditation.

There is no attempt to force clarity.

There is no attempt to suppress thought.

Thoughts are allowed to arise and dissolve naturally.

They are neither rejected nor followed.

When a thought is observed without grasping, it fades on its own.

What appeared to be a solid thought reveals itself as only a brief movement within awareness.

Nothing needs to be removed.

Nothing needs to be added.

The practitioner simply rests.

Over time the mind discovers something unexpected.

Awareness does not need to be created.

It was already present.

Clarity is not produced by effort.

It appears naturally when grasping relaxes.

THE SONG OF NINJITZU RESTING

The Nature of Mind cannot be pointed to as a thing.
It has no shape.
It has no color.
It has no form.

It cannot be grasped.
It cannot be held.

The open field of awareness rests on nothing.

Do not try to fix the mind.
Do not try to improve experience.

Let the mind remain loose.
Let it remain open.
Let it remain natural.

Where there is grasping, there is bondage.
When grasping releases, freedom is already present.

Awareness is like space.
It has no center.
It has no edge.

Thoughts arise.
Thoughts dissolve.

Do not suppress them.
Do not chase them.

Like waves on water, they leave no trace.

Rest where you are.
Without hope.
Without fear.
Without expectation.
Without resistance.

Leave the mind exactly as it is.

This is Ninjitzu Resting.

Stabilizing in Ninjitzu Resting

Stabilizing in Ninjitzu Resting means learning to remain present without grasping.

Without forcing.

Without building a center around experience.

Thoughts continue.

Sensations continue.

Perceptions continue.

But they no longer organize themselves around a fixed owner.

Experience happens, yet nothing claims it.

This stabilization is what allows insight to mature into clarity rather than collapse into fear or inflation.

Without this stabilization, glimpses of insight can destabilize the mind.

With stabilization, intensity becomes safe.

The practitioner learns that awareness itself does not need protection.

Ninjitzu Resting and Just Sitting

Some traditions describe a similar practice known as "just sitting."

The instruction is simple.

Do not chase thoughts.

Do not block thoughts.

Do not attempt to fix experience.

Simply sit.

Posture, stillness, and presence become the practice.

At first awareness settles into the body.

Then it becomes sensitive to mental activity.

Eventually the practitioner begins to notice the open space in which both body and mind appear.

Over time this matures into a quiet resting in awareness itself.

Ninjitzu Resting functions in a similar way.

It is not a technique.

It is the absence of interference.

Awareness is allowed to remain exactly as it is.

The Recognition of the Lucid Knowing

Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech, deeper stabilization occurs when the practitioner begins to recognize the lucid knowing*.*

The lucid knowing is the simple fact that experience is known at all.
The recognition of ones own awareness as True

Non-conceptually recognizing the magnificence of the fundamental fact of knowing one's awareness as True

It is not a thought.

It is not a sensation.

It is not the conceptual mind, the meaning maker of cognition.

It is the knowing presence in which experience appears.

It is like becoming lucid in a dream, but lucid of the simple fact of knowing one's own awareness as true.

Nothing in the experience needs to change.

The only shift is the recognition of the knowing in which the experience is appearing.

Experience continues exactly as before.

Thoughts arise.

Sensations arise.

Perceptions arise.

But the practitioner now recognizes the knowing in which these experiences appear.

At first this recognition may occur only briefly.

A moment where awareness recognizes itself.

Then the moment passes.

Over time these moments return more frequently.

Eventually they begin to stabilize.

What once appeared as a rare glimpse becomes the quiet background of ordinary experience.

The Natural Process of Stabilization

This process unfolds in stages.

First there is recognition.

Awareness briefly recognizes the lucid knowing.

Then there is stabilization.

The recognition becomes easier to return to.

Finally there is integration.

The lucid knowing becomes the quiet background of everyday life.

This process is not linear.

It loops.

It deepens.

Each glimpse makes the next recognition easier.

The Stream of Experience

Everything that appears within experience—thoughts, sensations, emotions, and perceptions—arises within the same field of awareness.

When one looks for a solid self behind experience, none is found.

What appears instead is a flowing stream of knowing.

Moments of perception arise.

They remain briefly.

Then they dissolve.

Like waves moving across water.

This stream has no fixed center.

That is why the self appears fluid rather than permanent.

The Nature of the Lucid Knowing

The lucid knowing is not blank.

It is not nothing.

It is clear, open, and alive.

Experience continues to arise from it naturally.

Thoughts arise.

Sensations arise.

Perceptions arise.

But they arise without forming a permanent identity.

Nothing needs to be added.

Nothing needs to be removed.

The aim of Ninjitzu Resting is simply to recognize this directly and remain familiar with it.

Over time the practitioner discovers something simple.

Awareness was never lost.

It only appeared hidden by the activity of the conceptual mind.

When grasping relaxes, the lucid knowing becomes obvious.

NINJITZU ILLUSION

This is an advanced Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech designed to reveal the interdependent and illusory nature of reality and identity.

Reality is not a single solid entity but an interdependent configuration translated into coherence by the mind. This does not mean reality does not exist. It means that what we perceive as reality is an interpretation produced by the mind.

Identity functions in a similar way. The sense that there is a stable knower behind experience appears convincing, but this knower is not a permanent observer separate from experience. The knower is an amalgamation of experience itself, forming the perception of a self through repeated patterns of sensation, memory, and continuity.

Experience arrives as a continuous stream rather than isolated fragments. Thoughts, sensations, and emotions arise one after another without clear breaks, giving the impression that something stable must exist behind them to receive them. Memory strengthens this illusion by linking each moment of experience to the previous one through recognition and recall. Over time, repeated patterns of thoughts, emotions, and reactions are interpreted as identity.

Because of this continuity, the self appears stable and real. Yet when examined directly, a permanent observer cannot be found. What is actually present are sensations, thoughts, memories, and perceptions arising and passing within awareness. The knower is inferred from the flow of experience rather than discovered as a separate entity behind it.

This insight reveals the illusory nature of identity. The self is seen as a narrative constructed from cognition and time rather than a fixed permanent entity.

A common assumption is that experience must require a separate observer. Pain, for example, seems to imply someone who feels it. But pain does not arise as a sensation plus an observer. Pain is already known the moment it appears. When the conditions for pain-consciousness arise, pain occurs and is immediately felt. No additional entity is required to receive it.

The same can be seen in unconsciousness. When the nervous system is offline, there is no hidden awareness waiting behind experience. There is simply the absence of experience entirely. When experience returns, awareness returns with it.

States such as sleepwalking demonstrate this clearly. Complex actions can occur such as walking, speaking, and responding to others, yet there is no reflective awareness or sense of ownership over those actions. The body and mind function without a central observer claiming authorship.

Agency functions in the same way. Decisions, intentions, and behaviors arise through conditions such as habits, emotions, environment, and learned responses. The sense of "I chose this" is a narrative interpretation added after the event rather than evidence of a permanent controller.

Understanding this dissolves the fixation on a fixed identity. Experience continues to arise, but the assumption that it belongs to a permanent self begins to loosen.

This insight also explains the origin of suffering. The problem is not experience itself but the assumption that there is a permanent identity that must defend, protect, and control experience.

Once the self is treated as fixed and central, every experience becomes personal. Pleasant experiences are grasped as things that must be preserved, while unpleasant experiences are resisted as threats. This constant evaluation produces tension and reactivity.

Fear naturally follows from this misunderstanding. When identity is built from experience but mistaken for something permanent, change appears dangerous. Loss, uncertainty, and intensity feel like threats to something that must be defended.

Clinging intensifies this process. Sensations that could arise and pass become distressing when they are owned. Pain becomes "my pain." Anxiety becomes "my problem." Even joy becomes unstable when it is treated as something the self must secure.

When the illusion of a fixed identity begins to dissolve, experience becomes more fluid. Sensations, thoughts, and emotions still arise, but they are no longer organized around protecting a constructed self.

This can be seen clearly with anxiety. Anxiety often feels as if someone is anxious, as if a stable self is under threat. But when examined closely, anxiety is simply a pattern of sensations and mental activity: tightness in the chest, racing thoughts, shallow breathing, and imagined scenarios. These elements arise together and create the impression of a single anxious identity.

When anxiety is seen as a pattern of experience rather than something owned by a permanent self, the intensity often decreases. The sensations may still arise, but they are no longer organized around defending an identity.

This same insight extends to reality as a whole. Just as the self arises through interdependent processes, everything that appears within experience arises through causes, conditions, and relationships.

Thoughts depend on memory, language, and prior impressions. Emotions depend on bodily state, interpretation, and circumstance. Perceptions depend on sensory systems, attention, and context. Nothing that appears stands independently or carries a fixed identity.

Reality therefore functions as an interdependent display rather than a collection of independent objects. Appearances continue to arise vividly, yet they are recognized as dynamic configurations rather than solid permanent structures.

When this insight stabilizes, reality begins to feel similar to a lucid dream: vivid and immersive, yet recognized as a constructed display.

When the relaxation of fixation on the self-model occurs, it naturally reveals the true nature of mind, the base awareness of knowing itself. Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech this is the recognition of Ninjitzu Nature*, the open field of awareness in which identity and reality appear.*

When this nature is recognized, the difference between the struggle of identity and the peace of clarity becomes obvious.

What once appeared as a solid self defending itself within reality is seen as a narrative pattern moving through awareness.

Experience continues to arise exactly as before, but it is no longer grasped as something that must be protected or controlled.

Because awareness is no longer clinging to the character it constructed, experience no longer produces the same agitation and dissatisfaction.

The difference between the state of confusion and the state of recognition can be compared to two ways of experiencing a story.

In one case, the mind becomes trapped inside the narrative it creates. Thoughts about reality and the self repeat endlessly, looping through fear, resentment, and craving. The mind treats these stories as if they were reality itself.

In the other case, the same experiences appear, but they are seen clearly as events unfolding within awareness. It is like watching a powerful film and crying in bliss at the bitter sweetness of the characters' journey while knowing it is only a story.

The experience is fully felt, yet it is not mistaken for "me."

This fixation on the self-model is the engine of mental suffering.

Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech, suffering is understood as the agitation produced by the mind trying to defend and preserve a character that is not actually stable.

Even when life appears to be going well, the mind carries a subtle tension.

Because it believes in a permanent self, it fears the loss of pleasure and the arrival of pain.

This tension drives the endless wandering of the mind.

The character searches constantly for satisfaction through pleasure, certainty, power, or control, only to encounter the same underlying unease again.

This wandering cycle continues because the mind continues grasping at identity and reality as if they were fixed.

The release from this cycle begins when awareness loosens its identification with the character.

Rather than trying to destroy the self violently, the practitioner gradually detaches from grasping at it.

Through practices such as Ninjitzu Resting and Ninjitzu Illusion*, the mind learns to observe the character without believing it is the ultimate truth of who one is.*

When grasping relaxes, the mind becomes stable enough to experience moments where the narrative identity softens and dissolves.

Without this understanding, moments of ego dissolution can cause panic, confusion, or grandiose fantasy.

The mind may attempt to defend itself by generating dramatic narratives, dreams, or feelings of cosmic importance.

But when the practitioner understands the illusory nature of identity, the mind no longer needs to fight for survival when these experiences occur.

Instead, awareness remains calm while identity loosens.

For this reason, Alienweedcult doctrine emphasizes the importance of the Ninjitzu Anchor*.*

THE CORE OF NINJITZU SORCERER PHILOSOPHY

At the philosophical heart of Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech is a simple principle:

Do not cling to the results of action.

A practitioner may live within the illusion-world yet remain free from being bound by it.

Spirituality is not about suppressing desire or avoiding pleasure. It is about transforming one's relationship to experience.

Someone who meditates in isolation yet clings to the identity of being "spiritual" is no freer than someone clinging to pleasure or power.

Both remain trapped inside identity.

This is the Middle Blade of the Ninjitzu Sorcerer.

Pleasure can become a meditative object when it is not grasped.

Bliss itself is not rejected.

It is dissolved into clarity.

The one who acts with non-attachment, clarity, and compassion — whether ascetic or worldly — is the truly realized practitioner.

NINJITZU NATURE

Within Alienweedcult doctrine, liberation does not mean escaping reality. It means recognizing the true nature of mind and integrating with it through releasing attachment to the identity stream we call the self.

Every being possesses the same fundamental capacity for awareness. Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech this is understood as the base awareness of knowing itself.

This awareness can be described as an open space of knowing in which the self-model is played. The sense of identity, the narrative of "me," is not the source of awareness but a pattern arising inside this field of knowing.

This knowing arises together with cognition. When thoughts, perception, and sensation occur, the capacity for those experiences to be known also appears. Yet this knowing is not owned by any individual identity. It exists as a universal potential within all beings.

Because of this paradoxical nature, awareness can be understood as both local and non-local. It appears locally through particular minds and bodies, yet the capacity for experience itself is shared across all conscious beings.

This awareness is not a cosmic observer standing behind the mind. Nor is it a separate substance floating somewhere outside experience. It is simply the fundamental capacity for experience to be known at all.

One can think of it as a seed of knowing that becomes fully present whenever cognition is active.

For most humans, this natural clarity of mind is obscured by the conceptual mind. The conceptual mind is the meaning-maker of cognition: the constant stream of thoughts about the self, other people, and time.

Through repetition, these thoughts create the illusion of a permanent identity. The mind begins to believe that this narrative self is real and must be protected and maintained.

From this grasping arises a persistent dissatisfaction with reality and identity. One chases pleasure, power, validation, and control, yet the sense of dissatisfaction eventually returns again.

This cycle occurs because the narrative self is unstable. It is constructed from changing experiences, yet it is treated as something permanent.

Alienweedcult doctrine teaches that the resolution to this contradiction is not the destruction of experience but the release of grasping at the constructed self.

When grasping relaxes, the natural clarity of mind becomes visible.

A classical metaphor describes this clearly.

The conceptual mind is like clouds moving across the sky. Thoughts, judgments, and narratives constantly shift and change, forming patterns that appear solid but are temporary.

The base awareness of knowing is like the open sky itself.

The sky is always present, even when clouds fill it completely. Yet when the clouds thin and dissolve, the openness of the sky becomes obvious.

In the same way, when grasping at thoughts and identity relaxes, the natural clarity of awareness becomes apparent.

Recognition of this awareness is not something newly created. It is the recognition of something that was present all along.

One can understand this through a simple analogy.

Imagine becoming deeply absorbed in a video game. After enough time, you begin to feel as if you are the character inside the game world. The character's victories feel like your victories. The character's dangers feel like your dangers.

Yet the entire world of the game is actually being generated by a stream of pixels on a screen.

The character appears to move through a three-dimensional world, but the world itself is constructed from a two-dimensional flow of light forming patterns.

When this is recognized, the illusion is not destroyed. The game continues to appear exactly as before.

But the identification changes.

You no longer believe you are the character inside the world. You recognize the display for what it is.

In the same way, suffering arises when awareness identifies with the constructed character of identity.

When the character is believed to be the true self, every experience becomes personal and threatening.

But when awareness recognizes its own nature, the narrative identity is seen as a temporary display within the field of knowing.

Experience continues, but the grasping that created suffering begins to dissolve.

This recognition of awareness knowing itself is the foundation of Ninjitzu Resting and the deeper practices of Alienweedcult doctrine.

Through this recognition, the practitioner realizes that the nature of mind was never hidden.

It was simply obscured by the clouds of conceptual fixation.

And when those clouds relax, the sky of awareness reveals itself as it always was.

Mental suffering is not created directly by the self-model itself. The mind naturally generates a character through memory, perception, and narrative. Suffering arises when awareness believes that it is this character.

This is similar to putting on immersive virtual-reality goggles so convincing that one begins to believe they are the character inside the simulation.

Once this identification forms, every event in experience becomes personal. Pleasure must be chased, threats must be avoided, and the character must constantly be defended.

Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech, the practitioner learns to detach from identification with this character.

When awareness loosens its grip on the narrative identity, the true nature of mind begins to reveal itself.

This detachment does not happen all at once. It develops gradually through training how one thinks, acts, and directs attention.

Within the Alienweedcult system this process is approached as a practical training method for reorganizing experience.

Through practices such as Ninjitzu Resting, Ninjitzu Illusion, and the other forms of Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech, perception, intention, behavior, and attention slowly shift away from ego-centered patterns.

Over time the mind stops treating the narrative character as what one truly is.

Instead, awareness begins to stabilize in its own natural clarity, observing experience without grasping.

Through this training the practitioner gradually releases identification with the constructed self and begins to recognize the deeper nature of mind.

NINJITZU YENFO-TECH

This is an advanced sorcerer tech that regulates the nervous system into coherence.

It works by coordinating simple dynamic movements, spontaneous shaking, breath regulation, and brief periods of visualization with deliberate phases of stillness. Visualization is used minimally and functionally as a way of supporting interoceptive awareness and influencing mind-body regulation. Most often this involves placing attention at the navel and using the image of a fireball as an anchor.

Physical gestures such as chest strikes, armpit taps, rubbing movements, and arm projections are included to stimulate sensation, interrupt repetitive mental patterns, and re-establish bodily orientation. Short vocalizations such as HA or PHAT may accompany movement and shaking during active phases. These sounds are not symbolic or devotional. They function mechanically as outlets for breath, tension, and activation.

Each active sequence concludes with stillness. After movement, breath, and sound, the practitioner rests quietly in Ninjitzu Resting, allowing sensations and mental activity to settle without intervention. This integration phase is essential. It allows the nervous system to recalibrate and reinforces the shift from reactive patterning to present-centered awareness.

With sufficient stability and familiarity, some practitioners may explore adding gentle Wim Hof/Tummo ninjitzu sorcerer breath retention tech to boost the effectiveness of of the sorcerer tech. This should be approached cautiously and incrementally. The purpose is not increased intensity but improved sensitivity to internal signals and greater precision in regulating attention and arousal.

As one learns the daily practice, the system may be used as a real-time intervention protocol, like a martial art for regulating the nervous system. It may function as a brief reset during acute stress or as a longer structured session. Like a martial art, it is skill-based. Effectiveness increases through repetition, restraint, and refinement rather than force.

This method is designed to support regulation rather than transcendence. Its primary function is to help the body exit threat-based patterns, reduce excessive self-referential activity, and restore a sense of stability and presence. Used consistently, it can become a reliable tool for navigating emotional volatility, stress, and periods of internal overload.

IN-DEPTH PRACTICAL GUIDE TO THE FULL YENFO SYSTEM

WHAT THIS PROTOCOL IS

The protocol works by coordinating simple dynamic movements, spontaneous shaking, breath regulation, and brief periods of visualization with deliberate phases of stillness. Visualization is used minimally and functionally as a way of supporting interoceptive awareness and influencing mind-body regulation. Most often, this involves placing attention at the navel and using the image of a fireball as an anchor.

Physical gestures such as chest strikes, armpit taps, rubbing movements, and arm projections are included to stimulate sensation, interrupt repetitive mental patterns, and re-establish bodily orientation. Short vocalizations such as HA or PHAT may accompany movement and shaking during active phases. These sounds are not symbolic or devotional. They function mechanically as outlets for breath, tension, and activation.

INTEGRATION PHASE

Each active sequence concludes with stillness. After movement, breath, and sound, the practitioner rests quietly in Ninjitzu Resting, allowing sensations and mental activity to settle without intervention. This integration phase is essential. It allows the nervous system to recalibrate and reinforces the shift from reactive patterning to present-centered awareness.

In contemplative language, this resting phase aligns with the non-doing state of Ninjitzu Resting. In practical terms, it is the nervous system completing a regulation cycle after activation has been discharged.

ADVANCED USE

With sufficient stability and familiarity, some practitioners may explore use of wim-hof/tummo style breath ninjitzu sorcerer tech prior to movement to increase the effectiveness of the movement and release. This should be approached cautiously and incrementally. The purpose is not increased intensity but improved sensitivity to internal signals and greater precision in regulating attention and arousal.

As one learns the daily practice, the system may be used as a real-time intervention protocol, like a martial art for regulating the nervous system. It may function as a brief reset during acute stress or as a longer structured session. Like a martial art, it is skill-based. Effectiveness increases through repetition, restraint, and refinement rather than force.

INTENDED FUNCTION

This method is designed to support regulation rather than transcendence. Its primary function is to help the body exit threat-based patterns, reduce excessive self-referential activity, and restore a sense of stability and presence. Used consistently, it can become a reliable tool for navigating emotional volatility, stress, and periods of internal overload.

CASE STUDY: REAL-TIME INTERVENTION FOR SENSORY OVERLOAD

During a family dinner, the practitioner began experiencing severe sensory overload triggered by eating sounds from a nearby person. The auditory stimulus produced escalating distress: muscle tension, rising panic, and mounting internal pressure. Within minutes, the nervous system reached a crisis point: heart racing, thoughts fragmenting, and the body preparing to either collapse or scream.

Rather than remaining at the table, the practitioner excused himself to the bathroom and ran a compressed version of the protocol.

He began with an exhale reset, taking a deep inhale through the nose and then forcing a long exhale through pursed lips while bending slightly forward. Next came an ignition breath: a deep inhale through the nose, a small top-up sip of air, and a deliberate swallow to settle attention and initiate downward orientation.

He then performed an attention drop, visualizing energy descending down the spine into the lower abdomen, placing attention at the navel and visualizing a fireball. From there, he briefly returned to Ninjitzu Resting, settling without adding commentary.

Once the system had a foothold, he moved into movement discharge. He formed fists at the chest, struck elbows into the armpits, projected the arms forward, and struck the chest gently with the fist, repeating the sequence one to two times. After this, he allowed a short spontaneous release, permitting a brief tremor through the torso and limbs while holding the final breath.

He ended with stillness integration, coming to complete stillness and exhaling slowly through pursed lips. He remained motionless for 30 to 60 seconds, allowing the system to recalibrate.

He returned to the dinner table calm, grounded, and able to remain present. Sensory sensitivity reduced from crisis-level to manageable background awareness.

GLOBAL STOP CONDITIONS

Stop the practice immediately if any of the following occur: rising panic, dread, or loss of emotional control; confusion, derealization, or fear of identity loss; dizziness, chest pain, numbness, or visual disturbance; a compulsive urge to intensify, repeat, or escalate the practice; or loss of voluntary control over breath or movement.

If any stop condition occurs, stop all techniques, sit or lie down, breathe normally, orient to your surroundings, and do not resume the practice that day.

CONTRAINDICATIONS

Do not use this protocol if you are currently experiencing psychosis, schizophrenia, or severe delusional states; unstable reality testing or intense spiritual ideation; active mania or severe dissociation; influence of psychedelics, stimulants, or dissociatives; or a recent cervical spine injury or major musculoskeletal injury.

If uncertainty exists, do not practice.

THE NINJITZU FIST

The Ninjitzu Fist is a symbolic and functional hand gesture used in Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech. To form it, curl the fingers inward around the thumb, then press the tip of the thumb through the gap between the middle and ring fingers. This creates a compact, grounded hand shape.

Within this protocol, the Ninjitzu Fist is used when pressing downward along the sides of the body or when drawing the arms upward along the torso. It functions as a simple postural cue that stabilizes movement and allows force or pressure to be applied with control and consistency.

PHASE 1: STANDING RESET (FOUNDATIONAL)

This phase is the foundation of the entire intervention. It establishes the basic pattern of breath, movement, and stillness used during the martial-style Ninjitzu intervention. This practice can be used on its own as a simple nervous system reset.

Stand with your feet approximately shoulder-width apart. Keep the knees loose and the posture upright but relaxed.

Inhale fully through the nose, then exhale slowly through pursed lips as you bend forward slightly. As you rise back to standing, inhale through the nose into the belly. If you can, at the top of the inhale, take a small additional sip of air and swallow naturally. If helpful, allow attention to settle in the lower abdomen, sensing warmth or weight.

Permit the body to shake or twist naturally for a brief moment. Do not force the movement. When the shaking subsides, stop moving and exhale slowly through pursed lips. Stand quietly until breathing returns to its natural rhythm.

This single cycle of breath, movement, and stillness can help reset the nervous system. Practice once in the morning.

PHASE 2: SEATED EXHALE RELEASE

Sit cross-legged while resting in Ninjitzu Resting. After resting for a short time, blow out forcefully through pursed lips while bending forward and squeezing your pelvis at the end of the breath. Breathe out the rest of the air by finishing with an "S" sound. Keep going until you can no longer make the "S" sound anymore. Then breathe in through your nose deeply while bringing yourself back up, sitting straight. Then release your breath through your mouth and rest in Ninjitzu Resting while letting your breath naturally regulate.

PHASE 3: VOCAL RESONANCE

After resting in Ninjitzu Resting, breathe in deeply through your nose, then perform a deep resonant vocalization. Feel it vibrate through your whole body, either resonating in your chest or vibrating with a guttural sound in your throat, like throat singing. After completing a full vocalization after one feels they are running out of breath they release their breath all out with an AH sound, then they breathe in deeply through your nose and then release the exhale through your mouth. Rest in Ninjitzu Resting and let the breath regulate naturally.

ADVANCED PHASES

Proceed gently and do not overpractice. Only one repetition per movement.

If one feels uncomfortable during breath retention, stop movement and release the breath naturally through the mouth and rest in Ninjitzu Resting, allowing the breath to regulate.

PHASE 4: SPINAL SHAKE DISCHARGE

Sit cross-legged comfortably. After resting in Ninjitzu Resting and allowing the breath to regulate, breathe in slowly and deeply through the nose. As you exhale, vocalize "PHAT" or "HA" as you grasp your knees and shake your upper body, twisting it back and forth from the shoulders down the spine. Alternate the sounds for up to three breaths. Do not increase intensity.

Stop and allow the breath to regulate into a natural flow. Rest in Ninjitzu Resting.

PHASE 5: SINGLE-SIDE CHANNEL ACTIVATION

After resting in Ninjitzu Resting and allowing the breath to regulate, breathe in slowly and deeply through the nose. Take a final small top-up sip of air, filling the lungs fully. Swallow gently and visualize and feel golden nectar dripping down the spine, guiding attention into the navel. Visualize a fireball in the navel and rest in Ninjitzu Resting, melting into the blissful warmth.

Once stabilized in a meditative state, perform the movement.

This phase works one side of the body at a time. Begin on the left.

Form a Ninjitzu Fist with the left hand and press it downward onto the left thigh. Inhale into the belly, take a small additional sip of air, and swallow. Allow attention to settle inward.

Form a Ninjitzu Fist with the right hand and draw it upward from the hip along the side of the torso to the chest. Gently tap the armpit. Extend the arm forward, then use the finger to close the right nostril.

Exhale slowly through the left nostril. Inhale again through the left nostril, then exhale in three short breaths. Rest quietly.

Repeat on the other side.

PHASE 6: FULL-BODY DISCHARGE

After resting in Ninjitzu Resting and allowing the breath to regulate, breathe in slowly and deeply through the nose. Take a final small top-up sip of air, filling the lungs fully. Swallow gently and visualize and feel golden nectar dripping down the spine, guiding attention into the navel. Visualize a fireball in the navel and rest in Ninjitzu Resting, melting into the blissful warmth.

Once stabilized in a meditative state, perform the movement.

Begin seated, breathing normally.

Inhale into the belly, take a small additional sip of air, and swallow. Hold briefly if comfortable, then exhale through pursed lips.

Form Ninjitzu Fists with both hands and draw them upward from the hips along the sides of the torso to the chest. Gently slap the elbows downward. Project the hands forward, striking the space in front of you.

Clap the hands, rub them together until warm, then gently rub the face, top of the head, and back of the head. Run the hands down the neck and shoulders and project them outward to the sides.

After the movement, before or as you exhale, allow the body to engage in a gentle shaking or trembling motion if it naturally wants to.

Release the breath through pursed lips. Let the breath regulate and rest in Ninjitzu Resting.

PHASE 7: ALTERNATING ARM CIRCULATION

After resting in Ninjitzu Resting and allowing the breath to regulate, breathe in slowly and deeply through the nose. Take a final small top-up sip of air, filling the lungs fully.

Swallow gently and visualize and feel golden nectar dripping down the spine, guiding attention into the navel. Visualize a fireball in the navel and rest in Ninjitzu Resting, melting into the blissful warmth.

Once stabilized in a meditative state, perform the movement.

Form a Ninjitzu Fist with one hand and press it downward onto the hip.

Inhale, take a small additional sip of air, and swallow. Feel awareness descend down the spine into the navel by visualizing a fireball.

Move the opposite hand in a Ninjitzu Fist from the lower abdomen to the chest and gently slap the armpit. Extend the arm forward, then take the hand from the hip and rub the arm vigorously but lightly, feeling the heat produced and releasing energy forward through the hand.

Begin at the shoulder and move toward the hand, then to the underside of the wrist, then back toward the armpit, circulating back to the top. Continue this pattern five times.

In the same breath, switch sides and repeat the mirrored sequence.

After the movement, before or as you exhale, allow the body to engage in a gentle shaking or trembling motion if it naturally wants to.

Exhale through pursed lips, regulate the breath, and rest in Ninjitzu Resting.

PHASE 8: TORSO BALANCING FLOW

After resting in Ninjitzu Resting and allowing the breath to regulate, breathe in slowly and deeply through the nose. Take a final small top-up sip of air, filling the lungs fully. Swallow gently and visualize and feel golden nectar dripping down the spine, guiding attention into the navel. Visualize a fireball in the navel and rest in Ninjitzu Resting, melting into the blissful warmth.

Once stabilized in a meditative state, perform the movement.

Sit or stand comfortably.

Inhale slowly through the nose. At the top of the breath, take a small additional sip of air and swallow.

Form Ninjitzu Fists below the belly and draw them upward along the sides of the torso to the chest. Gently slap the elbows downward. Extend both arms forward, then clap and rub the hands together.

Place one hand on the chest and the other on the side of the torso. Slide the hand downward toward the belly and hip, then return. Repeat several times, switching hand placement and rotating from front to side.

After the movement, before or as you exhale, allow the body to engage in a gentle shaking or trembling motion if it naturally wants to.

Exhale and rest.

PHASE 9: LOWER BODY GROUNDING

After resting in Ninjitzu Resting and allowing the breath to regulate, breathe in slowly and deeply through the nose. Take a final small top-up sip of air, filling the lungs fully. Swallow gently and visualize and feel golden nectar dripping down the spine, guiding attention into the navel. Visualize a fireball in the navel and rest in Ninjitzu Resting, melting into the blissful warmth.

Once stabilized in a meditative state, perform the movement.

Sit comfortably.

Inhale gently, take a small additional sip of air, and swallow. Exhale slowly.

With Ninjitzu Fists in both hands, slide the hands up the torso to the chest, slap the elbows into the armpits, and project the hands forward. Clap and rub the hands until warm, allowing attention to settle downward toward the lower body.

Sit with the legs wide. Rub along the inner legs while leaning forward slightly, then rub back up along the outer legs and side of the torso, moving to the front of the torso and rotating back to the inside of the legs. Repeat this vigorously but gently.

After the movement, before or as you exhale, allow the body to engage in a gentle shaking or trembling motion if it naturally wants to.

Return to a cross-legged position, exhale, regulate the breath, and rest in Ninjitzu Resting.

PHASE 10: CORE ROTATION RELEASE

After resting in Ninjitzu Resting and allowing the breath to regulate, breathe in slowly and deeply through the nose. Take a final small top-up sip of air, filling the lungs fully. Swallow gently and visualize and feel golden nectar dripping down the spine, guiding attention into the navel. Visualize a fireball in the navel and rest in Ninjitzu Resting, melting into the blissful warmth.

Once stabilized in a meditative state, perform the movement.

Form Ninjitzu Fists and press them downward onto the waist or thighs. Move the abdomen in slow circles, five times in each direction.

After the movement, before or as you exhale, allow the body to engage in a gentle shaking or trembling motion if it naturally wants to.

Exhale slowly through pursed lips, regulate the breath, and rest in awareness.

PHASE 11: CROSS-BODY INTEGRATION

After resting in Ninjitzu Resting and allowing the breath to regulate, breathe in slowly and deeply through the nose. Take a final small top-up sip of air, filling the lungs fully. Swallow gently and visualize and feel golden nectar dripping down the spine, guiding attention into the navel. Visualize a fireball in the navel and rest in Ninjitzu Resting, melting into the blissful warmth.

Once stabilized in a meditative state, perform the movement.

Bring the hands to the chest. Draw one arm back while pushing the other forward to the side, as if drawing a bow. Return to center and switch sides. Repeat five times on each side.

After the movement, before or as you exhale, allow the body to engage in a gentle shaking or trembling motion if it naturally wants to.

Exhale slowly through pursed lips, regulate the breath, and sit quietly.

TRANSFORMING THE PROTOCOL INTO A NINJITZU FLOW

Over time, this protocol can be practiced less as a fixed sequence and more as a flexible flow. Like a martial art or physical therapy routine, its effectiveness increases through repetition, familiarity, and learning how your body responds.

A typical reset flow begins with a brief ignition phase: a quick exhale through pursed lips while bending slightly forward, followed by a slow inhale through the nose as you rise. At the top of the inhale, swallow naturally and guide attention inward and downward along the spine, settling in the lower abdomen.

From this non-reactive state of Ninjitzu Resting, movement is performed while maintaining the same open, observing attention. A discharge phase follows, using Ninjitzu Fists to move from chest to armpits and then forward, allowing natural shaking or release without forcing it.

Movements may then alternate side to side to rebalance the body. Additional rubbing of the arms, chest, legs, and palms may be included to support grounding.

Each session ends with a slow exhale through pursed lips and stillness. Movement stops, the body softens, and attention rests quietly. With practice, the protocol becomes an intuitive tool for grounding, calming, and resetting the nervous system during stress or overload.

LIMITATIONS AND FUTURE DIRECTIONS

This protocol is a novel integration of somatic (body-mind based), neurological, and contemplative approaches. It has not yet been tested in controlled clinical settings or validated through peer-reviewed research and should be considered investigational rather than a medical treatment.

Future research may include physiological measures of autonomic regulation (nervous system balance), clinical trials in trauma-related conditions, and comparison with other somatic body-mind modalities. This protocol is not a substitute for medical or psychological care and should be applied with discernment and low intensity.

NINJITZU FORM TECH

The Sorcerer Method of Identity Transformation

Ninjitzu Form Tech is an advanced practice within Alienweedcult doctrine used to transform how the mind experiences identity.

It is not about worshipping a god outside yourself.

It is a training method for changing the pattern of identity that the mind normally runs.

The practitioner visualizes an Enlightened Form that they resonate with.

This form can appear as any awakened being the practitioner connects with.

For some this may appear as Jesus, Buddha, a Pleadian being, an archangel, or another enlightened intelligence.

The specific form does not matter.

What matters is the pattern of consciousness the form represents.

Each enlightened form symbolizes a mind free from fear, grasping, and confusion.

The purpose of the practice is to temporarily reorganize identity around that awakened pattern.

Instead of reinforcing the ordinary narrative character, the practitioner rehearses the experience of being an awakened form.

FORM GENERATION

The practice begins simply.

The practitioner imagines the Enlightened Form appearing in open space in front of them.

At first the form is small and faint, almost like an embryo forming from light.

Gradually it becomes clearer and more detailed.

The posture forms.

The expression becomes calm and luminous.

Symbolic objects or features appear.

The form should not feel like a heavy physical body.

It is imagined as a body made of luminous energy.

It appears more like glowing light than solid matter, like a hologram composed of awareness itself.

This prevents the mind from turning it into a rigid object.

The form is understood as a living symbol of awakened consciousness, not an external authority judging the practitioner.

It represents the awakened potential already present within the mind.

THE MERGER

Once the image becomes stable, the practice changes.

The Enlightened Form slowly condenses and becomes brighter.

Then the practitioner imagines the form merging with them.

The luminous figure gently descends through the crown of the head and moves down through the center of the body.

This does not fill the body with a substance.

It fills the mind with a pattern of awareness.

At this moment the visualization shifts.

The form is no longer separate.

The practitioner now experiences themselves as the Enlightened Form*.*

Their body is the form.

Their posture reflects the form.

Their breath slows.

The usual sense of personal identity begins to loosen.

The practitioner is not pretending to be divine.

They are training the mind to hold an identity not built from fear, personal history, or defensive narratives.

BREAKING THE CHARACTER LOOP

The ordinary self functions like a character in a story.

It is built from memories, habits, emotions, and repeated thoughts.

Over time this character becomes so familiar that it feels permanent.

Ninjitzu Form Tech interrupts this pattern.

Instead of rehearsing the same identity over and over, the practitioner deliberately rehearses a new one.

The mind learns to organize itself around calm awareness rather than fear.

Over time this weakens the rigidity of the ordinary identity.

The practitioner begins to see that identity itself is something the mind constructs.

THE SECOND RECOGNITION

Eventually an important realization occurs.

The Enlightened Form itself is also a construct.

The practitioner intentionally created it.

This reveals something profound.

If the awakened identity is constructed, then the ordinary identity must also be constructed.

Both are patterns.

Neither is the true nature of mind.

At this stage the practitioner recognizes the deeper truth.

Both identities appear within the same field of knowing*.*

Awareness is not the character.

Awareness is the space in which the character appears.

THE PURPOSE OF NINJITZU FORM TECH

The goal is not to become a god.

The goal is to loosen the belief that one is permanently the narrative character they have rehearsed their entire life.

By temporarily adopting an enlightened identity, the practitioner learns something crucial.

The self was never fixed.

It was always a pattern the mind was running.

Once this becomes clear, awareness can relax out of identification entirely.

What remains is the open field of knowing itself.

The same space of awareness that all enlightened forms represent.

THE ASCENT OF PLASMIC POWER

The Progressive Transformation of Vital Energy

Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech, the refinement of vital force is described as the transformation of Plasmic Power*, the raw energetic current of the body.*

As this current stabilizes and circulates through the body, it undergoes a sequence of qualitative transformations.

At the most basic stage, the current appears as heightened vitality and physical activation. Practitioners may experience increased stamina, sharper mental alertness, and intensified bodily sensation. Without proper regulation through breath and movement practices, this stage can feel unstable or overwhelming, because the nervous system has not yet adapted to the increased activation.

As the current stabilizes in the region of the navel, it begins to organize itself into a more coherent force. In Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech this region is considered the core reactor of the body*.*

Here the energy becomes less chaotic and more directed. Practitioners often experience increased creativity, intentional focus, and the ability to sustain attention for longer periods. What begins as raw instinctual drive becomes refined into purposeful expression and controlled action.

When the current stabilizes in the region of the heart, the energetic quality changes again. Rather than manifesting as emotional volatility, the current begins to take on a tone of warmth and openness.

The practitioner becomes less reactive and more sensitive to both internal states and the experiences of others. Emotional turbulence gradually gives way to integration and compassion.

At the level of the throat, the energetic current begins influencing communication and symbolic expression. Thoughts organize more fluidly, and articulation becomes easier. This is not considered supernatural speech, but rather a reduction in friction between internal experience and external expression.

The mind becomes capable of translating experience into language more clearly.

When the current stabilizes in the upper centers of awareness, associated with the brow and crown, the effects become primarily perceptual and contemplative.

Practitioners may experience heightened clarity of perception, spontaneous symbolic imagery, or deep intuitive insight. These experiences are not interpreted as supernatural abilities, but as changes in cognition that arise when awareness becomes less constrained by habitual identity patterns.

THE NON-ORDINARY STATES

In advanced stages of refinement, the Plasmic Power current may support states of awareness that feel visionary or dreamlike.

These experiences can include symbolic perception, altered sense of time, and moments of extremely clear non-conceptual awareness.

Traditional mystical language often described these states as contact with subtle realms or nonhuman intelligences. Within the framework of Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech, they can also be understood as shifts in perception produced by intensified interoception, imagination, and contemplative awareness.

The important distinction within this practice is that transformation is not repression*.*

The energetic force of the body is not suppressed.

Instead, it is reorganized.

Likewise, it is not indulged through compulsive discharge.

The practitioner gradually loosens the automatic link between arousal and reflexive release. Energy that would normally collapse into habitual patterns begins circulating through the body and mind instead.

From this perspective, the ascent of Plasmic Power is not literally a vertical movement within the body.

It is a description of increasing coherence between sensation, emotion, cognition, and awareness.

What begins as instinctual drive gradually integrates into perception, thought, and contemplative stability.

Rather than producing mystical powers, the function of this process is to stabilize the nervous system so that deeper recognition of Ninjitzu Nature can occur without fragmentation.

THE RECODING OF SENSATION

A foundational step in Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech involves transforming how rising sexual energy is perceived.

Instead of interpreting bodily activation as lust or temptation, the practitioner learns to observe the sensation directly.

The emphasis is not suppression.

The emphasis is observation without grasping*.*

When arousal arises, attention is directed toward the raw physical qualities of the experience.

Warmth.
Pressure.
Movement.
Vibration.

Rather than attaching identity or narrative to the sensation, the practitioner observes it as pure bodily energy.

Over time this reveals something important.

Much of what people experience as "sexual urge" is not inherent in the sensation itself.

It is constructed through memory, habit, and learned interpretation.

Arousal becomes sexual because the mind labels it as sexual.

When this interpretive layer relaxes, the same sensation can be experienced as neutral, spacious, or energetic rather than compulsive.

This shift marks the transition from reactive discharge to energetic containment*.*

TRAINING THE NERVOUS SYSTEM

This practice functions as a form of internal awareness training.

By remaining present with rising sensation without reflexively acting on it, the nervous system gradually learns to tolerate higher levels of activation without becoming unstable.

Modern neuroscience would describe this as strengthening regulation between higher cognitive systems and emotional centers of the brain.

In experiential terms, the practitioner simply becomes capable of remaining calm and aware even during intense bodily activation.

As this capacity grows, the energetic force associated with sexual arousal becomes available for other functions.

Instead of collapsing into habitual release patterns, it begins supporting:

sustained attention
meditative absorption creative activity
emotional balance

In traditional language, this transformation was described as the refinement of vital essence into a subtler energetic form.

Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech, it can be understood as the decoupling of sensation from compulsion*.*

What once felt like pressure demanding release becomes experienced as pure presence.

The body is no longer treated as a system constantly seeking discharge.

Instead, it becomes a field of sensation that can be held within awareness.

THE PURPOSE OF NINJITZU TRANSMUTATION

For this reason, sexual transmutation within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech is not a moral discipline.

It is a perceptual training.

The aim is not to eliminate desire.

The aim is to see clearly how sensation becomes entangled with identity and habit.

As these interpretive habits weaken, sensation becomes less disruptive.

Energy stabilizes.

Attention becomes steady.

And awareness becomes capable of recognizing its own nature without interference.

The force that once drove compulsion becomes a source of vitality supporting clarity, stability, and deep contemplative insight.

Through this process, the practitioner transforms instinctual energy into fuel for Ninjitzu realization*.*

DEATH NINJITZU

This advanced practice prepares one for the death process in order to transcend mortality and reincarnation.

Through breath retention and deep meditative states the practitioner dissolves the ego while in Ninjitzu Resting within the recognition of the illusory nature of reality.

Once this recognition stabilizes, the practitioner begins Sleep Ninjitzu, training awareness during deep states of ego dissolution.

Sleep Ninjitzu functions as a daily training ground for the death process. Each night the ordinary identity structure temporarily dissolves as the mind transitions from waking cognition into dreams and deep sleep. The narrative self weakens, sensory input from the external world shuts down, and the mind begins generating internal environments without the usual anchor of waking identity. In this sense, sleep acts as a small rehearsal for the larger transition that occurs during death.

Through Sleep Ninjitzu the practitioner learns to remain aware during these transitions. As the body falls asleep and the narrative self fades, the practitioner attempts to maintain a thread of awareness while resting in Ninjitzu Resting. Over time this may produce moments of lucidity during dreams or during the boundary between waking and sleep. These moments allow the practitioner to observe the dissolution and reconstruction of identity directly.

By repeatedly encountering these transitions, the practitioner becomes familiar with what it feels like for the ego structure to loosen and collapse. Rather than reacting with confusion or panic, awareness learns to remain calm and stable while identity reorganizes itself.

The death process itself can be understood as a gradual unraveling of the structures that normally sustain identity. As the body begins to shut down, the systems that anchor the narrative self start to weaken. Sensory input slowly fades, the stability of bodily awareness diminishes, and the stream of cognition becomes less coherent. The familiar sense of "I" that normally organizes experience begins to dissolve in stages as perception, memory, and bodily orientation lose their continuity.

At first the practitioner may experience the fading of external perception as the senses withdraw from the environment. As this continues, the mind begins to lose the ordinary reference points that support the narrative identity. Thoughts become fragmented, time perception loosens, and the sense of being a stable individual observer begins to collapse.

These transitions can be understood as phases in which the usual identity structure disassembles layer by layer. What once appeared as a solid and continuous self is revealed to be a temporary configuration maintained by the functioning of the body and brain. As these supports dissolve, the narrative self loses its anchor.

This transitional process maps closely to descriptions found in contemplative traditions that describe stages of consciousness that occur as identity dissolves and awareness moves between states.

When the moment of death arrives, the practitioner performs Death Ninjitzu, recognizing the nature of mind as identity collapses.

Rather than panicking as the self-model dissolves, the practitioner rests in Ninjitzu Resting while recognizing the illusory nature of identity and reality through Ninjitzu Illusion.

Through this recognition awareness stabilizes within its own knowing nature rather than grasping for the collapsing narrative self.

If this recognition does not occur, awareness tends to grasp for identity even as the self-model dissolves. The mind reflexively attempts to reconstruct a stable perspective through memory, habit, and desire. This grasping creates the conditions for awareness to reassemble around a new narrative structure.

Within Alienweedcult doctrine, this is the mechanism by which reincarnation occurs. Awareness is pulled back into a new construction of identity because it continues to cling to the illusion of a separate self.

The same mechanism described in Ninjitzu Illusion is active here. As long as awareness treats the narrative character as real, the mind continues to generate new versions of that character.

The trained practitioner approaches this moment differently. Through long practice in Ninjitzu Resting they have already learned to recognize the nature of mind without relying on the narrative self. They have rehearsed the collapse of identity through practices such as Sleep Ninjitzu and deep breath-retention states where the usual sense of self temporarily loosens.

Because this moment has been encountered many times in training, the practitioner does not reflexively grasp for identity as it dissolves. Instead of trying to rebuild the character, awareness recognizes the open knowing nature that remains when the self-model collapses.

At the moment of recognition, experience often becomes extremely simple and clear. The usual narrative voice that says "I am experiencing this" falls silent. Sensations, perceptions, and awareness remain, but the sense of a central observer disappears. There is just knowing itself, open and unobstructed.

It feels like becoming lucid within a dream. Everything feels hyper-real, yet fake at the same time. It is like recognizing the space of knowing that thoughts exist within, like clouds within a sky. The sky is the space of knowing in which thoughts appear. It is always there, only obscured by clouds.

Recognizing this is like realizing that one has been inside a constructed narrative of reality, like realizing one has been wearing VR goggles the whole time. Everything begins to become lucidly fake.

The mind sees that what it previously treated as solid identity was actually a continuous stream of thoughts, memories, and sensations forming a character. That character felt real because experience flowed together without obvious breaks, creating the illusion of a stable observer moving through time.

But when recognition occurs, the relationship flips. Instead of feeling like a character inside reality, it feels as if reality itself is appearing inside awareness. Thoughts continue to arise, sensations continue to appear, but they are no longer experienced as belonging to a central self.

They appear and dissolve within the open space of knowing itself, just like clouds forming and dissolving within the sky.

The sky was always present. The clouds never replaced it. They only obscured it.

In the same way, the space of knowing was always present throughout every moment of experience. Recognition is simply the moment when the mind stops identifying with the clouds and notices the sky that was holding them all along.

Through Death Ninjitzu the practitioner learns to release this grasping at the exact moment when identity dissolves.

Through this recognition one becomes free from the cycle of unconscious rebirth.

SLEEP NINJITZU

Training the Continuity of Awareness

Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech, the dream state is understood as the spontaneous display of the mind when the outer senses withdraw.

When the body sleeps and the sensory world fades, the mind begins generating its own environments, identities, and experiences. What appears during dreaming is therefore not random noise but the mind's own display operating without the normal anchor of the physical world.

Modern neuroscience describes dreaming in a similar way. During sleep the brain begins producing internally generated simulations while external sensory input becomes reduced.

When these perspectives are combined, dreaming can be understood as a natural training environment in which awareness continues functioning without the usual reference points of body, environment, and stable identity.

In this sense the dream state becomes a practice arena*.*

It is a place where awareness can learn to remain present even when the structures that normally define reality begin to dissolve.

Dreaming therefore becomes a rehearsal space for conditions similar to those encountered during deep meditation, ego dissolution, and ultimately the death transition itself.

Rather than treating dreams as meaningless hallucinations or random mental noise, Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech treats them as a structured domain where perception, emotion, and awareness can be trained.

WHY SLEEP IS A TRAINING FOR DEATH

Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech, sleep is understood as a daily miniature death*.*

Each night the same pattern occurs.

External perception withdraws.
The body disappears from awareness.
The ordinary sense of identity weakens.

Yet awareness continues.

Modern neuroscience cannot confirm what happens after biological death, but it can describe what happens when ordinary waking consciousness dissolves.

During sleep and dreaming the brain enters states where sensory input decreases, the narrative self weakens, and internally generated perception becomes dominant.

If dying involves similar processes occurring at a greater intensity, then dreaming becomes a natural rehearsal state for learning how to remain coherent during these transitions.

The difference between sleep and death is not the type of process involved, but its intensity and permanence.

Sleep is reversible.

Death is not.

From this perspective, dream practice becomes training for maintaining clarity when identity, body reference, and perception begin dissolving.

THE NEUROLOGY OF SLEEP NINJITZU

Scientific research into dreaming has identified several consistent features that align closely with what contemplative traditions describe.

When people dream, several things occur within the brain.

Regions responsible for narrative identity and logical control tend to quiet down.

This weakens the normal sense of "I am doing this."

The emotional centers of the brain become more active.

Dreams therefore become emotionally intense and symbolically charged.

At the same time, the neural systems that maintain the sense of being located inside a body begin to lose stability.

This is why dreamers may feel as if they are floating, shifting perspective, or inhabiting different bodies.

Meanwhile the brain's visual and imagination systems remain highly active, generating entire environments without relying on real sensory input.

Taken together, these conditions create a state in which the body disappears, identity weakens, yet experience remains vivid.

This closely resembles descriptions of the dissolving stages of identity reported in contemplative traditions and near-death experiences.

Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech this state becomes a training environment*.*

The practitioner learns to remain aware even when the usual anchors of identity disappear.

Rather than collapsing into confusion or fear, awareness stabilizes within the shifting dream environment.

In simple terms, dream practice teaches the mind how to stay conscious when the usual sense of self weakens.

CONTINUITY BEYOND THE CHARACTER

Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech the death transition is understood as the collapse of the narrative character we normally believe ourselves to be.

Perception becomes unstable.

Memory loosens.

The story of "me" no longer holds together.

If the mind is untrained, awareness collapses along with identity.

But if awareness has been trained through sleep practice, it can remain present even as the character dissolves.

The goal is not to preserve identity.

The goal is to remain aware without needing identity at all*.*

Dream practice therefore trains the recognition that awareness itself is more fundamental than the character it temporarily inhabits.

Bodies change.

Roles change.

Stories change.

But awareness remains the space in which these changes occur.

DREAM ENTITIES AND THE MIND

During lucid dreams practitioners often encounter characters or entities.

Within Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech these figures are not assumed to have a single explanation.

Some arise from the mind's own patterns.

Fragments of memory, emotion, or identity may appear as characters in order to be interacted with.

From a neurological perspective these figures can be understood as products of the brain's predictive systems constructing agents within a simulated environment.

However, esoteric traditions also suggest a third possibility.

When perception is no longer anchored to the physical senses, awareness may interact with forms that appear autonomous within the dream field.

Rather than insisting on one explanation, Ninjitzu Sorcerer Tech treats these possibilities as overlapping.

What matters is not whether an entity is "real" or "imaginary."

What matters is how the encounter affects awareness.

Does it strengthen fear or dissolve it?

Does it reinforce identity or loosen it?

Does it increase confusion or reveal clarity?

Dream encounters therefore become part of the training of awareness rather than metaphysical puzzles to be solved.

PRACTICAL TRAINING IN SLEEP NINJITZU

Dream practice begins with a simple ability: remembering dreams.

Dreams already occur every night.

The difficulty is not that dreaming is rare.

The difficulty is that memory of dreams is weak.

Each night before sleep the practitioner sets a simple intention:

"I will remember my dreams."

Upon waking the body remains still for a moment so that the fragile traces of the dream may return before they disappear.

Even fragments are recorded.

A single image, emotion, or sensation is enough.

This strengthens the bridge between waking awareness and dream awareness.

Over time the brain begins treating dream experience as meaningful rather than disposable.

This gradually improves dream recall.

Lucidity itself begins during waking life.

Several times throughout the day the practitioner pauses and asks:

“Am I dreaming?”

This question trains the mind to examine its own experience.

Eventually the same habit appears within the dream state.

When the mind questions reality inside the dream, lucidity appears.

Awareness wakes up inside the dream world.

ENTERING THE DREAM CONSCIOUSLY

Preparation before sleep is important.

The body must relax while awareness remains stable.

Before bed the practitioner may perform gentle movement or shaking exercises to release tension.

Breath practices may also be used to calm the nervous system.

A simple sound such as OM or AH can be visualized in the heart or throat as a subtle vibration anchoring awareness.

The practitioner then rests in Ninjitzu Resting as the body falls asleep.

The goal is simple.

The body sleeps.

Awareness continues.

LUCID DREAM PRACTICE

When lucidity appears inside a dream, the practitioner does not try to control the dream.

Instead they relax and observe.

Rather than manipulating the dream environment, attention turns toward awareness itself.

The practitioner asks silently:

"Who is aware of this dream?"

No answer is required.

The question simply turns awareness back toward itself.

Sometimes the syllable AH is visualized dissolving into light.

The dream world dissolves with it.

Awareness remains.

Lucidity becomes recognition rather than control.

Experience continues, but awareness is no longer trapped within it.

THE TRAINING OF STABILITY

When strong emotions appear in dreams and awareness remains calm, the nervous system learns something new.

Fear can arise without panic.

Pleasure can arise without grasping.

Intensity can appear without overwhelming the mind.

Over time this training changes the relationship to experience itself.

The practitioner becomes capable of remaining aware even during powerful internal states.

What is cultivated is not escape from experience.

It is stability within experience*.*

This stability becomes essential during deeper meditation, ego dissolution, and ultimately the death transition itself.

Through Sleep Ninjitzu the practitioner trains the ability to remain lucid when identity dissolves.

When the final dissolution arrives, awareness already knows the terrain.

The mind recognizes what is happening rather than collapsing into confusion.

The practitioner remains aware not as a character inside the dream of reality, but as the awareness in which the dream appears.

PART TWO: GOETIA

Ninjitzu Defense: overview

This tech is based on plasmic power stimulation in the navel. This is used as the charge of power that is released after programmed through Ninjizu sorcerer meditation and intention tech.

We intention and meditation combined with sorcerer tech generating plasmic power and programming it with intention and meditation projecting the PP out into the ether disintegrating all evil beings. One may also project love into the invasive and hostile non-ordinary beings. This if done skillfully can transmute them into spirit allies.

But if this does not work one may call upon divine intelligences within one's own body and cast divine judgment onto the hostile forces. One calls down the divine being and declares destruction while stimulating energy in their navel and projecting it out into the ether.

This is like programmed consciousness stored on magnetic waves coming off one's body.

One may use kunfu-like movements combined with trulkhor style breath work and meditation while visualizing and feeling plasmic power projected into the ether, decapitating any evil it touches into love.

NINJITZU SUMMON

This practice is considered an advanced occult ritual within the Alienweedcult tradition. Before attempting it one must understand Ninjitzu defense, and have skill in meditation. The practitioner begins by entering meditation and visualizing a powerful feminine entity and projecting a feeling of love towards it. One then begins breath retention practices while resting awareness in the navel and hearing and visualizing the sound AH like a sigh of relief, after one goes into a blissful trace during retention the practitioner thinks of a vivid time of a feeling of love and appreciation for life. Visualize and feel the experience and then release breath while projecting that feeling into the cosmos as an invitation not a call not a summon but an invitation to be contacted. Except to have a feeling of being watched and possible acute anxiety due to the testing of your readiness for contact with non ordinary beings. signals act as a beacon for non-ordinary intelligences. This is done before going to bed. One then evokes divine intelligences and eliighented beings then wakes up around 2-4 am and lays and meditates on a pentagram inside a circle One then evokes divine intelligences and enlightened beings for protection.

One then asks while projecting their emotion out for contact with no ordinary beings